JOFFRE "PUTS ON SCREW." Generalissimo Not "Nibbling" Any More, Says Pollu.

Gen. Joffre once called himself a nib-"I am nibbling at the enemy," he said, A "poilu" has found another metaphor for the generalissimo's method. He says that Joffre is "putting on the screw." A civilian was discussing the afternoon communique on the terrace of a cafe with a "poilu," returned from the front,

The civilian did so, looking and feeling gentiest of pressures, as of a fashionable physician. But soon he increased the pressure to such an extent that the civilian began to feel very uncomfort-able. Indeed, he rose from his seat, Seneca Tribe met Friday night at Bank twisted about, and begged for mercy. The "poilu" grinned, but showed himself as merciful as he is vigorous.

"There, I let you go," he said. "But Joffre won't let the Boches go so easily. Even when they cry enough, he'll give another turn to the screw. He'll keep on till he has them on the rush. And these are the tactics of our Joffre," concluded the "poilu," triumphantly.
